W: Did your father encourage you to climb b Mt. Qomolangma?

M: No. I did ask him to pull some strings /so that ti could climb b with an Indian expedition,/ and he flatly said no. He climbed /so that b we wouldn't have to.

W: Did you climb b any mountains with him/ when you were a kid?

M: Mt. Biciroy, a training peak.

W: What did he say at the top?

M: He didn't talk much,/ but t from his smile / I could b see he was proud.

W: The Sherpa view of climbing is different t from the western view?

M: We Sherpas believe /that t mountains s are places where the Gods live, /especially Mt Qomolangma. Before we climb, /we perform religious ceremonies to ask God for permission and safe passage. Sherpas don't have any interest t in climbing mountains. Mostly they climb as a necessity,/ to make b money,/ but t the western world looks on Mt Qomolangma as a another rock and says, /"Wow, this s is the highest mountain. Let's go conquer r it." You don't conquer Mt. Qomolangma. You go on Mt. Qomolangma. Just as if you are crawling into your mother's lap.

W: Let's talk about t the day you reached the summit of Mt. Qomolangma.

M: My desire to climb b Mt. Qomolangma grew even more /after my father died in 1986. I wanted b to climb b to understand him. Throughout t the whole climb/ I thought about t it. On the final day, I felt t my father was pulling or pushing me, /because I didn't know where this energy came from. When i finally got t to the top, I cried. I could see my dad there with a big smile.
